Optimization of structural systems such as bridges, building frames, aircraft wings, and ship hulls needs to account for uncertainty in material properties, environmental conditions, manufacturing precision, and load effects. We formulate such optimization problems using the buffered failure probability and compare the approach with the traditional one based on the failure probability. The resulting optimization models are challenging to solve numerically and we discuss several algorithmic strategies.