

Maximizing your Mentoring and Developmental Network

presented by

Greta Hsu, Ph.D.

Associate Professor of Management | UC Davis Graduate School of Management

Your success in the workplace depends on the quality of your mentoring relationships.

Research has shown mentors can impact important career outcomes such as pay, career advancement and work satisfaction. In recent years, changes in the structures of careers have compelled changes in approaches to the mentoring relationship. The traditional approach is to focus on cultivating a single senior-level mentor in your organization who provides professional advice, support, and endorsement.

In this workshop, you will learn about an alternative approach that centers on cultivating a “developmental network”—a set of advisors you turn to for informational, emotional and strategic support. You will build understanding of what effective mentoring and developmental networks look like, the principles that make these networks so effective, and the common challenges people face in building and maintaining effective developmental relationships. You will come away with new skills and a powerful new approach to enhance your network, professional relationship—and your career.

Who Should Attend?
